

Carillon Concert Depends on Rain

The Carillon concert which is scheduled for 3:00 p.m. Thanksgiving Day, cannot be played if there is rain at that time. Further waterproofing of the ringing room was held up as the workmen took off for deer season (they got two).

However the soldering furnaces were fired up Tuesday and festoons of silicone putty applied. Things are better, but some water still comes in on the wooden keyboard. A new roof may have to be applied.

The prediction is that rain will have stopped by Thanksgiving afternoon; the cold front already having wrung the air dry.

Some of the transcriptions to be played were done in Holland for the American Bicentennial. They are unusual, but then it was the Dutch who brought the Pilgrims over in the first place, making Thanksgiving possible.
